of bread, the size of a large fist. A man stood behind the shelf and handed the bread, a piece to each, to the people as they came up and gave him the peso. He was deaf to the importunities of the whining women as they begged for more. The line thinned down and the mother could see her turn at the counter coming. The pile of bread diminished rapidly and when the mother arrived there was none.

"Aie, and there will be no food for my man-child who works at the smelter? It is necessary, senor, that we have bread."

She was pushed aside and the doors of the bakery were closed in the faces of the waiting women.

The mother and daughter went home and to sleep—paying no attention to the curses of Emilio Tovar when he returned to the house and was compelled to go breakfastless to bed.

THE DOG

By Louis Dodge.

What is it in the presence of this wistful-eyed little black dog

That lies near my feet, regarding me steadily between intervals of sleep,

That has taken such firm possession of me? What can it be?

Not alone his fidelity, surely—though he lies on the stairs

Just outside my door while I sleep and will not stir until I appear.

Not his need for me; for is not the earth filled with needy creatures?

Not his responsiveness; though he leaps for joy when I am glad,

And draws apart solemnly and broods and watches me when I am troubled.

Not his joyousness; though he barks and whines his delight

When I permit him to go with me, and becomes a very picture of gladness

As he runs on ahead, and pauses, with one forefoot lifted,

And his whole body eloquent with questioning, as he waits for me.

Not his humble burdens—though I cannot bear to hear his dreamy whimper

When he lies asleep and passes through imaginary ordeals.

Not his capacity for repose—though he can wait and wait patiently

While I am away and he cannot know how I fare or when I shall return.

Not the gallant courage of him—though he knows how to be glad

Without fear of the 'morrow, and without brooding over his prospects.

Not because of his honest humility—though he asks for no food

Save when I have sat at table; and then only as if he asked for companionship

Rather than for material benefits.

What is it in the little fond creature which gladdens me

And makes big evils trivial, as long as he lies here on his rug?

Can it be that those who threw away my love and spurned me

Left that which was best in me where this little dog could find it?

Can it be that when the betrayals of life took much of my soul from me

This poor dumb creature rescued it, to watch over it for me?

Can it be that when I cast fond dreams away from me
